

×

Will you help keep Vox free?

Vox's journalism is free, so that everyone can understand our world. Reader support helps us do that. Will you give today?

Yes, I'll Give

MONEY POLITICS

The controversy around Trump's fast-food football feast, explained

People are calling Trump's McDonald's and Wendy's meal for the Clemson Tigers racist and classist.

By Rebecca Jennings | @rebexxxa | Updated Jan 30, 2019, 4:23pm EST

Trump presenting a buffet of fast food to be served to the Clemson Tigers football team. | Chris Kleponis/Pool/Getty Images

Since joining Vox in 2018, her work has explored the rise of TikTok, internet aesthetics, and the pursuit of money and fame online. You can sign up for her biweekly Vox Culture newsletter here.

When President Trump welcomed the Clemson Tigers, national college football champions, to the White House on January 14, he served them burgers, pizza, and fries from some of America's most storied institutions: fast-food chains.

The resulting buffet, which included hamburgers, fries, salads, and fish sandwiches from McDonald's, Burger King, and Wendy's alongside Domino's pizza, was a strange choice, particularly for an event held in the 140-seat State Dining Room, which traditionally hosts formal dinners for ambassadors and heads of state.

Join the Vox Video Lab

Go behind the scenes. Chat with creators. Support Vox video. Become a member of the Vox Video Lab on YouTube today. (Heads up: You might be asked to sign in to Google first.)

But it was also a choice that Trump and the White House blamed on the partial government shutdown, the longest in US history. Like many other federal institutions, the White House kitchen was not operating at the time, partly a result of Trump's refusal to support a bill that doesn't include funding for a $5 billion wall on the Mexican border.

In an explanation for the evening's menu, White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders tweeted, "The Democrats' refusal to compromise on border security and reopen the government didn't stop President Trump from hosting national champion @ClemsonFB tonight. He personally paid for the event to be catered by some of America's great fast food joints."

Though he told reporters that he had personally bought "300 hamburgers," in a tweet the next morning that number had skyrocketed to "1000 hamberders [sic]." (Photos and videos of the scene show that the lower number is likely the more correct one.)

Not found

Great being with the National Champion Clemson Tigers last night at the White House. Because of the Shutdown I served them massive amounts of Fast Food (I paid), over 1000 hamberders etc. Within one hour, it was all gone. Great guys and big eaters!

— Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) January 15, 2019

But though this provides a clear, if a bit insignificant, portrait of the ease at which Trump is capable of lying, others have accused Trump of disrespecting the athletes by serving them cheap fast food. Some have also argued that the right thing to do would have been to bring in his kitchen staff at the Trump International Hotel, which is just three blocks from the White House.

There were, of course, the sorts of viral tweets that one would expect on such an occasion. One poked fun at the juxtaposition of presumably hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of silver and china "holding $29.50 of lukewarm dog shit," another called it "probably the best metaphor for Trump's presidency that I can think of." A third likened the move to something that Talladega Nights' Ricky Bobby would do, comparing Trump to the wealthy yet unsophisticated protagonist.

Not found

Here's a video I shot of President Trump showing off his 300 hamburgers.

pic.twitter.com/P06S6l5w07

— Hunter Walker (@hunterw) January 14, 2019

At least some of the guests, for their part, seem to have appreciated the dinner choice; Clemson quarterback Trevor Lawrence told TMZ that "It was awesome." Trump himself has also long professed to be a fan of fast food, possibly out of a fear of being poisoned, so it's likely that he enjoyed the meal just fine.

For some, Trump's comments, particularly when he speculated to reporters prior to the event that “I would think that’s their favorite food,” referring to chains like McDonald’s and Wendy’s, rang as classist or racist. It’s not much of a leap to assume that Trump guessed that many Clemson Tigers are black or come from working-class backgrounds, and thus presumed they prefer cheap, fatty foods over anything the White House would typically serve for guests in the State Dining Room.

This is a false assumption — studies show that people actually eat more fast food as their income levels rise, and about one-third of all US adults eat fast food on a given day — but it’s still a widespread one, and one that contributes to further stereotypes about black and poor people’s consumption habits being somehow less virtuous than rich people’s.

Yet as one person on Twitter pointed out, it wouldn’t be difficult to imagine a different president, perhaps one with less of a history of racism, buying a bunch of fast food for a college football team and coming across as “fun” or “accessible.”

To suggest that there’s something wrong with eating fast food at all is its own ethical conundrum — on the one hand, as Vox’s David Roberts notes, America’s largest fast-food corporations are predicated on “a vast network of animal suffering and ecological destruction and has in turn produced an epidemic of ill health.”

There is a difference, however, between criticizing the industry that makes fast food inescapable and proclaiming one’s own moral superiority over those who eat it (which is to say, most of us). No, there’s nothing wrong with college athletes, or the president, or anyone, really, eating fast food if they want to. But Trump’s comments that presume college athletes, who likely take great care of their bodies, would prefer a cheap buffet of burgers and fries over the kinds of food that one would expect to be served during a White House visit, have raised concern for some.

Yet most of Clemson’s black players didn’t even attend the event. A report by The Root revealed that three-fourths of the team’s black players remained in South Carolina rather than make the trek to DC, with three of them confirming that Trump was the reason why. “When asked if they regretted their decision to stay in South Carolina once they saw the piles of cold McMeat their teammates got to enjoy, all three laughed,” writes Michael Harriot. “‘Now if it was some Five Guys, I might feel different,’ responded one.”

Burger King, meanwhile, has responded in its typical “relatable brand” voice on Twitter.

Burger King

@BurgerKing · Follow

due to a large order placed yesterday, we're all out of hamberders.
just serving hamburgers today.

11:33 AM · Jan 15, 2019

 348.4K

 Reply

 Copy link

Read 10.8K replies

Want more stories from The Goods by Vox? Sign up for our newsletter here.

You've read 1 article in the last 30 days.

Contributions are a key part of the future of Vox

Readers rely on Vox for clear, nuanced coverage that not only illuminates the issues, but poses solutions, too. And we rely on help from our readers: Advertising and grants cover the majority of our costs, but we count on contributions to help us close the gaps in our budget. In fact, we’re looking to reach 95,000 individual contributions before the end of the year. Will you make the next contribution right now? Our average gift is just $20 — and it goes a long way in helping us keep our work free. Vox is here to help everyone understand what’s shaping the world — not just the people who can afford to pay for a subscription. We believe that’s an important part of building a more equal society. Join that mission by making a contribution today.

One-Time	Monthly	Annual
----------	---------	--------

☐ $5/month

☐ $10/month

☐ $25/month

☐ $50/month

☐ Other

We accept credit card, Apple Pay, and Google Pay. You can also contribute via

